The Young of the Sea Devil. You may find in the sea devil a curous illustration of nature's system for adjusting reproduction. The cod lays everal hundred thousand eggs at spawning because nearly all of them must necessarily be lost while floating on the waves and those which batch are mostly devoured. But the sea devil, which produces but a single young one at a time, retains the latter in its belly until the infant creature is from four to six feet in length, so that when born it is able to take care of itself and is in
